Accessing China's fixed income and credit markets

- How big is China's fixed income market, in onshore RMB paper, offshore RMB (Dim Sum) paper and in offshore FX-denominated paper, and why is the overall market gaining more attention amongst international investors?
- What is happening to China's fixed income market in terms of global bond indices and percentage weightings, and why?
- Is this a market in which private clients should get exposure?
- How do foreign investors access the market and find the best opportunities?
- ETFs? Actively-managed funds? Allocating specific money to DPM mandates? Which way is best?
- What are the dangers, and what are the must-avoid sectors?
- Is there a genuine risk of financial and currency instability in China?
- Is China's financial sector liberalisation – both of the fixed income market and of the RMB - opening the doors to great opportunity or potential disaster for foreign investors?
- Are foreign credit rating agencies making headway in the onshore market both from a regulatory and also a credibility point of view?
- What are the most appealing segments; for example, are Green bonds really taking off and do the returns measure up to the risks?
- How is Asia's wealth management community addressing the opportunity?
